Reader Profile

Based on the Quality Coding 2017 Reader Survey, the TYPICAL READER is a male iOS developer between the ages of 30–39. He may live anywhere around the world, but predominantly in the United States of America.

The typical reader uses the Swift programming language for iOS development, but still also uses Objective-C. He uses some kind of Continuous Integration, writes unit tests most of the time, and practices Test Driven Development at least once in a while. However, he is much less likely to use Pair Programming. He works remotely only once in a while.

The typical reader is interested in personal growth. He reads most of Jon’s blog posts and is especially interested in architecture and design, Test Driven Development, and unit testing. He reads regularly, attends a couple of conferences per year, and buys a couple of online courses per year. He is less likely to attend a webinar, but likes video learning.
